If the answer to ANY of the following questions is yes:

1. Are you employed to develop software for research?
2. Are you spending more time developing software than conducting research?
3. Are you employed as a researcher, even though you predominantly work on software development?
4. Are you the person who does computers in your research group?
5. Are you sometimes not named on research papers despite playing a fundamental part in developing the software used to create them?
6. Do you lack the metrics needed to progress your academic career, like papers and conference presentations, despite having made a significant contribution through software?

Then, regardless of your current title, you are also a Research Software Engineer. We are trying to establish a Community of Research Software Engineers (CERSE) across Edinburgh and we are holding a meeting you may be interested in at:

Seminar room 2,
Chancellor's building,
